These demands can involve simple 2-step but related directions with 1 object (e.g., "Get the tissue and wipe your nose."). During mealtime say, "Junior get the napkin and wipe your face." During bath time say, "Junior get the soap and wash your face." During dressing say, "Junior get your shoes and put them on your feet." Some types of words appear more frequently in directions than others – conjunctions, negatives, adjectives, and prepositions, for example, are often used in directions. Nearly every test item on one of the most commonly used assessments of following directions, the CELF-4's Concepts and Following Directions subtest, uses some combination of conjunctions, negatives, and prepositions. These concepts are particularly critical in academic directions. The ability to follow any specific direction depends upon the ability to comprehend the specific words within the direction. Not all one step directions are created equal. For example, a one step direction containing a negative is often more difficult than one with a similarly placed adjective. Obviously, following directions also requires aspects outside the domain of language, such as motivation, interest, and attention. Increasing proficiency in language should provide a natural boost to these overlapping aspects.
