The hostess who supplied him garret, dinners and attendance, lived on the floor below, and whenever he went out he was obliged to pass his kitchen, whose door was invariably open. And every time he passed, the young man been in an excessive irritable condition, dizzying on hypochondria. He had become so completely absorbed into himself, and isolated from his companions who feared to meet, not only his hostess, but anyone at all. He was crushed by poverty, but the anxieties of his position had ceased to weigh on him. He had given up to attend matters of practical importance; he had lost every desire to do so. Nothing any hostess could do had a real terror for him. But to be stopped on the stairs, to be forced to listen to his trivial, irrelevant gossip, to pestering requests for payment, threats and complaints, and to racking his brain for excuses, prevaricate, lie--no, rather than this, he would havedown the stairs like a cat and slip out invisible. : Насуными делами своими он совсем перестал и не отел заниматься? Yeah, everything's in a man's hands, and let the cowardice lose, it's axiom. It would be interesting to know what the most feared men are. Making a new step, saying a new word is what they most fear. But I'm talking too much. That's because I'm talking about doing nothing. Or maybe I'm talking because I don't do anything. Soon he sank into a deep thought, or more precisely speaking in a fullness of mind; He walked long not observing what was on him and did not take care of him. From time to time, something would be numbed, by the habit of talking to himself, to whom he had just confessed. At these times he became aware that his ideas were sometimes in a tangle and that he was very weak; for two days he had little tasty food. In that neighborhood of the city, however, little any short dress would have created surprise. Due to the proximity of the Hay market, the number of bad establishments, the preponderance of the commercial class and labor population crowded in these streets that no figure, Queer, it would have caused surprise. But there was so much bitterness accumulated and disdain in the heart of the young man, who, despite all the annoying youth, thought of his rags less than everyone in the street. It was a different matter when he met acquaintances or with former fellow students, who, in fact, did not like to meet at any time. And yet, when a drunk who, for some unknown reason, was brought somewhere in a huge hustle by a heavy strawberry horse, suddenly shouted at him as he passed: "Hey, up there, up there, up there, up there, and indicated it: the young man suddenly stopped at his hat. He had counted them once when he was lost in dreams. At the time he had not put faith in those dreams and he was just teasing from their horrible but daring unconsciousness. Now, a month later, he had begun to look at them differently, and, despite the monologues in which he put his impotence and indecision in jeopardy, he had unintentionally come to consider this dream "ideo" as an undertaking to be tempted. although he still did not realize it himself. This house was made out in small tenements and was inhabited by people who work of all kinds --dai, blacksmiths, cooks, Germans of sort, girls who take a living as they could, small employees, etc. There was a continuous coming and going through the two doors and the two courtyards of the house. Three or four doors were used in the building. The young man was very happy to meet anyone, and immediately slipped unnoticed through the door on the right, and on the staircase. It was a rear, dark and narrow staircase, he was already familiar with it, goalkeepers who were engaged in moving furniture from an apartment. He knew that the apartment had been occupied by a German was moving then, and therefore the fourth floor on this scale would have been unpredicted apart from the old. "It's still a good thing," he thought to himself, playing the bell of the old apartment, the bell gave a weak tinkle as if it was made of tin and not copper, small apartments in such houses always have bells that sound like that. The furniture, all very old and of yellow wood, consisted of a sofa with a huge folded wooden backrest, an oval table in front of the sofa, a dresser with a glass window fixed on it between the windows, chairs along the walls and two or three half-spec prints in yellow frames, which represent German damigelles with birds in their hands - this was all. He walked along the sidewalk like a drunk, regardless of the passers-by, and jostling against them, and came only in his senses when he was on the next road. Looking around, he noticed that he was standing near a tavern that was inserted by steps leading from the floor to the basement. At that time two drunken men went out to the door, abused and supportinganother, they mounted the steps. Without stopping to think, Raskolnikov went down the steps immediately. Until then he had never been in a tavern, but now he felt disgusting and was tormented by a burning thirst. He wanted a cold beer drink, and he attributed his sudden weakness to the desire for food. He sat in a sticky table in a dark and dirty corner; he ordered a beer, and he was drinking with impatience the first glass. He felt easier now; and his thoughts were clarified. But even at that time it had a dim preeboding that this happier frame of the mind was not even normal. > There were few people at the time in the tavern. In addition to the two drunk men he had met on the steps, a group of about five men and a girl with a show had left at the same time. Their departure left the room quiet and quite empty. The people still in the tavern were a man who seemed to be a craftsman, drunk, but not extremely, sitting in front of a pot of beer, and his companion, a huge man, stout with a gray beard, in a short fullskirted coat. He was very drunk: and he fell asleep on the bench; every now and then began as if in hiscracking his fingers, with his arms wide open and the upper part of his body that bound on the bench, while singing some insignificant chorus, trying to remember some lines like these:) Кроме теву опынные, что пались на лестнице?
